Do you have a high-potential employee on your team who would benefit from legal training with direct relevance to their role?

Emory University School of Law’s Juris Master program is designed to help employees broaden their knowledge of the law as it relates to their industry, enhancing their skills so they become even more valuable to their employers.

Benefits of the program to your organization

Assess risk and make more informed decisions

Students learn to navigate a wide range of legal matters: from detecting ambiguities in contracts to understanding the potential legal issues associated with privacy and information security systems.

Navigate complex regulatory environments

Professionals must understand the evolving legal and regulatory landscape as it relates to private and public organizations, be able to manage complex deals and transactions, and comply with regulations. The juris master program equips employees with the skills necessary to navigate these challenges.

Increase the employee’s value

The juris master degree provides a comprehensive working knowledge of the employee’s chosen field. Graduates can interact with legal counsel and outside parties more efficiently and identify and manage important legal issues.

My Employment Discrimination course heightened my ability to look at creative options and minimize organizational risks. With a greater understanding and appreciation for seeing situations from a different perspective, the JM program enhanced the contributions I can make as an experienced HR professional.

The ability to think analytically, be comfortable with legal concepts, and engage thoughtfully with counsel is an increasingly important advantage, especially in highly regulated industries like higher education and health care. The Juris Master program from Emory Law is an exciting opportunity to develop those skills, while remaining on a complementary career path.
